

Protecting New Mexico's Seniors and Residents with Disabilities: Why It Is Important to Preserve the Maintenance of Effort Requirement in the Affordable Care Act

For 35,000 seniors and 57,100 people with disabilities living in New Mexico, Medicaid is a vital safety net that helps them get the critical health care services they need. Medicaid covers services that other programs, including Medicare, do not cover, such as the home health aide and personal attendant services that help people with long-term care needs stay in their communities, as well as nursing home care. The Affordable Care Act includes an important protection that prohibits states from reducing their Medicaid eligibility levels or changing the rules to make it harder for people to enroll in Medicaid. This protection is referred to as the “maintenance of effort,” or MOE, requirement. This Affordable Care Act provision acts as a bridge to 2014, ensuring that important health coverage remains in place until the new law is fully implemented.

Right now, many states are considering making cuts to Medicaid. On January 7, 2011, governors from 28 states sent a letter to President Obama and congressional leadership asking Congress to remove the maintenance of effort requirement. Governor Martinez was among those who signed that letter. Stripping this important protection from the law would allow New Mexico to cut Medicaid eligibility, which could place many of its 92,100 seniors and residents with disabilities who rely on Medicaid at risk of losing the health coverage they depend on. And the consequences extend beyond those Medicaid beneficiaries—their families, their communities, New Mexico, and New Mexico's economy would also be harmed.

Many New Mexico seniors and residents with disabilities could lose Medicaid coverage

Federal law requires state Medicaid programs to cover very low-income seniors and people with disabilities. States have the option of expanding eligibility levels beyond the minimum required by law—for example, states can add programs to Medicaid that extend eligibility to certain groups with higher incomes. New Mexico is a state that goes beyond the minimum. And, as a result, thousands of additional New Mexico seniors and residents with disabilities have access to the long-term care they need. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, New Mexico could cut back on the programs that have expanded eligibility above the minimum Medicaid requires, putting coverage for many New Mexico seniors and residents with disabilities at risk.

More New Mexico seniors and residents with disabilities could be forced into nursing homes

In New Mexico, more than 20,000 seniors and people with disabilities, including both adults and children, are able to remain at home, live with their families, and stay in their communities because of Medicaid's home- and community-based programs. These programs provide personal aides, transportation, and other services and supports that help these individuals avoid more costly nursing home care. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, New Mexico could reduce eligibility for many of these programs. As a result, many of the New Mexicans who rely on home- and community-based programs could be at risk of losing the help they need to keep living at home.

More New Mexico families could face financial hardship due to nursing home costs

Currently, 38 states set Medicaid income eligibility for people who need nursing home care at the maximum allowed by federal law. New Mexico is one of these states. In New Mexico, nursing homes cost an average of $61,000 a year, which is more than most people can afford. Many of the New Mexicans who need long-term nursing home care exhaust their savings paying for care. For them, and for their families, Medicaid is a vital safety net. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, New Mexico could cut eligibility for nursing home residents who rely on Medicaid, shifting a larger financial burden to them and to their families.

New Mexico could make it harder for its seniors and residents with disabilities to enroll or stay in Medicaid

The maintenance of effort requirement also prohibits New Mexico from making enrollment in Medicaid more difficult. In the past, states have made enrollment harder by, for example, requiring more documentation to prove income or assets, changing the way income or assets are calculated to make it harder for people to qualify, or requiring more frequent recertification. These changes make it particularly hard for seniors and people with disabilities to enroll in and retain Medicaid coverage.

The burden on New Mexico's family caregivers could increase

Medicaid helps many of the estimated 320,000 New Mexicans who act as informal caregivers for family members, loved ones, and friends, by providing them with support that allows them to maintain jobs or simply rest when they need to. The typical caregiver loses wages and benefits, postpones personal medical care, and cuts back on household spending. Reduced wages and spending hurt New Mexico's tax revenue and economic growth. And businesses are hurt by higher absenteeism and staff turnover among caregivers. Many caregivers have families of their own to support, and Medicaid's added help is particularly critical in these difficult economic times. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, New Mexico could cut Medicaid eligibility, forcing many of its seniors and residents with disabilities out of the program, which would put a further strain on family caregivers at a cost to New Mexico families, businesses, and the state economy.

Conclusion

Medicaid is a vital program that helps tens of thousands of New Mexico seniors, residents with disabilities, and their families. Taking away the protection of the Affordable Care Act's maintenance of effort requirement would place those New Mexicans who rely on Medicaid for care at risk of losing the help they depend on. It would further burden the family members who care for them, which would, in turn, have economic consequences for New Mexico businesses and the state's economy. Removing the protection of the Affordable Care Act's maintenance of effort requirement is a bad idea for New Mexico and New Mexicans.

Sources available upon request.

