

Protecting South Carolina's Seniors and Residents with Disabilities: Why It Is Important to Preserve the Maintenance of Effort Requirement in the Affordable Care Act

For 84,400 seniors and 142,300 people with disabilities living in South Carolina, Medicaid is a vital safety net that helps them get the critical health care services they need. Medicaid covers services that other programs, including Medicare, do not cover, such as the home health aide and personal attendant services that help people with long-term care needs stay in their communities, as well as nursing home care. The Affordable Care Act includes an important protection that prohibits states from reducing their Medicaid eligibility levels or changing the rules to make it harder for people to enroll in Medicaid. This protection is referred to as the “maintenance of effort,” or MOE, requirement. This Affordable Care Act provision acts as a bridge to 2014, ensuring that important health coverage remains in place until the new law is fully implemented.

Right now, many states, including South Carolina, are considering making cuts to Medicaid. On January 7, 2011, governors from 28 states sent a letter to President Obama and congressional leadership asking Congress to remove the maintenance of effort requirement. Governor Sanford was among those who signed that letter. Stripping this important protection from the law would allow South Carolina to cut Medicaid eligibility, which could place many of its 226,700 seniors and residents with disabilities who rely on Medicaid at risk of losing the health coverage they depend on. And the consequences extend beyond those Medicaid beneficiaries—their families, their communities, South Carolina, and South Carolina's economy would also be harmed.

Many South Carolina seniors and residents with disabilities could lose Medicaid coverage

Federal law requires state Medicaid programs to cover very low-income seniors and people with disabilities. States have the option of getting substantial federal funding to extend Medicaid eligibility beyond the minimum required, and many states do. As a result, an additional 2.8 million seniors and 2.3 million adults with disabilities have Medicaid coverage nationally. South Carolina is a state that does more than the minimum. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, South Carolina could cut back Medicaid eligibility to the minimum required, putting coverage for many South Carolina seniors and residents with disabilities at risk.

More South Carolina seniors and residents with disabilities could be forced into nursing homes

In South Carolina, more than 29,000 seniors and people with disabilities, including both adults and children, are able to remain at home, live with their families, and stay in their communities because of Medicaid's home- and community-based programs. These programs provide personal aides, transportation, and other services and supports that help these individuals avoid more costly nursing home care. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, South Carolina could reduce eligibility for many of these programs. As a result, many of the South Carolinians who rely on home- and community-based programs could be at risk of losing the help they need to keep living at home.

More South Carolina families could face financial hardship due to nursing home costs

Currently, 38 states set Medicaid income eligibility for people who need nursing home care at the maximum allowed by federal law. South Carolina is one of these states. In South Carolina, nursing homes cost an average of $62,000 a year, which is more than most people can afford. Many of the South Carolinians who need long-term nursing home care exhaust their savings paying for care. For them, and for their families, Medicaid is a vital safety net. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, South Carolina could cut eligibility for nursing home residents who rely on Medicaid, shifting a larger financial burden to them and to their families.

South Carolina could make it harder for its seniors and residents with disabilities to enroll or stay in Medicaid

The maintenance of effort requirement also prohibits South Carolina from making enrollment in Medicaid more difficult. In the past, states have made enrollment harder by, for example, requiring more documentation to prove income or assets, changing the way income or assets are calculated to make it harder for people to qualify, or requiring more frequent recertification. These changes make it particularly hard for seniors and people with disabilities to enroll in and retain Medicaid coverage.

The burden on South Carolina's family caregivers could increase

Medicaid helps many of the estimated 880,000 South Carolinians who act as informal caregivers for family members, loved ones, and friends, by providing them with support that allows them to maintain jobs or simply rest when they need to. The typical caregiver loses wages and benefits, postpones personal medical care, and cuts back on household spending. Reduced wages and spending hurt South Carolina's tax revenue and economic growth. And businesses are hurt by higher absenteeism and staff turnover among caregivers. Many caregivers have families of their own to support, and Medicaid's added help is particularly critical in these difficult economic times. Without the maintenance of effort requirement, South Carolina could cut Medicaid eligibility, forcing many of its seniors and residents with disabilities out of the program, which would put a further strain on family caregivers at a cost to South Carolina families, businesses, and the state economy.

Conclusion

Medicaid is a vital program that helps hundreds of thousands of South Carolina seniors, residents with disabilities, and their families. Taking away the protection of the Affordable Care Act's maintenance of effort requirement would place those South Carolinians who rely on Medicaid for care at risk of losing the help they depend on. It would further burden the family members who care for them, which would, in turn, have economic consequences for South Carolina businesses and the state's economy. Removing the protection of the Affordable Care Act's maintenance of effort requirement is a bad idea for South Carolina and South Carolinians.
